

"Iluikak' by Mara Sánchez-Renero

Shot on the Sierra de Zongolica in Veracruz, Mexico, Mara Sánchez-Renero's series "Iluikak" invites us to approach the landscape and its local communities through the prism of dreamlike imagery.

The Nahuatl word tlapializtli refers to the act of keeping or preserving something. This concept reminds us that the Nahua civilization once possessed both a cultural and a spiritual legacy; as the bearers of this heritage, they had to persevere in order to strengthen the most vitally important elements of their existence.

In the wayward Mexico of today, where sociopolitical instability has prompted society to lose contact with its roots, heritage, and territory, Veracruz is one of many places where Mexican citizens face injustice on a daily basis. In hopes of bringing viewers'

In the Nahuatl language, iluikak means “in the sky.” The Zongolica mountain range in Veracruz is characterized by its high altitude, and clouds are an essential part of its imaginary. The Nahua community living in the sierras primarily dedicated to agriculture and the practice of religious customs, in which ancestral traditions that keep them connected to nature remain an important part of their particular identity.

In settings constructed from the shadows, geography, and states of concealment, my intention is to photograph the sierra and its inhabitants, using different light sources to create a point of clarity and focus within an uncertain environment. I work with light to trace and depict a certain symbology, one that produces a new way of perceiving each character.

“Iluikak” is an attempt to breach the conventions of an assumed identity. It is only at the limits of both the evident and the concealed—in isolating men and women from their everyday contexts and instead portraying them within the space of their imaginations, the space of their mythical existence—that we can witness the dissolution of constructed identity and thus confront the true uncertainty of human nature.

← Home

Info

← Home

Info

← Home

Info

← Home

Info

← Home

Info

← HomeInfo

Mara Sánchez-Renero is a Mexican photographer. She studied at the Institut d'estudis Fotogràfics de Catalunya (IEFC) in Barcelona, where she lived for 10 years. Her work seeks to create settings that reveal a specific and controlled environment and to explore the genre of portraiture within this context. In her images we witness the dissolution of constructed identities as her subjects are represented in the realm of our mythical existence, confronting us with what is uncertain about human nature.

← Home

Info

Festival, Arles- in 2015. Mara lives and works in Mexico City.

Website

All Rights Reserved. © Mara Sánchez-Renero

← Previous

© 2019 impressa mag